Grief is a common theme in this time of the coronavirus pandemic. The truth is, we are all grieving the loss of our normal routine, limited social contact, increased fear and anxiety, increased awareness of our mortality and a general sense of uncertainty about what the future holds. The impact of this widespread grief is more intense for individuals who are grieving a death during this time.

Even when the losses one experiences feel overwhelming, there are ways to cope.

AVOID COMPARISONS. We often try to minimize our pain by pointing out others who we see as having more difficult experiences. This behavior rarely makes us feel better; in contrast, it often brings a sense of shame or guilt about our struggles and difficult emotions. Instead, allow yourself to feel whatever emotions come to you without judgment or comparison. This practice will make it easier for you to pay attention to your own feelings and discover what you need to begin to heal.

PRACTICE SELF-COMPASSION. We are often hard on ourselves when we struggle with difficult emotions. However, this practice does not help us cope. When you find that you are being self critical, pause. Take a breath. Think about how you might respond to a dear friend or loved one struggling in the same way. Then, say to yourself – out loud or silently - whatever it is that you would say to that friend. Try to imagine the compassion you would have for your friend in the same situation and send that compassion to yourself.

UTILIZE RITUALS. There are many ways to mark significant moments and emotions. One of the most common ways we do this is with large, public rituals like memorial services, funerals, graduations or weddings. As we practice social distancing, we are reminded that rituals don’t have to be large public events. Perhaps you will choose to honor a loved one who has died by visiting a place that holds special memories you shared together. Or maybe you will work to benefit a cause that is important to the person you wish to remember.

SEEK SOCIAL SUPPORT SAFELY. Although we may not be able to connect with others in ways we have in the past, social support from a distance is still possible. Consider connecting with people you care about through technology, such as videoconferencing. Or return to an “old fashioned” way of communication and write them a letter. Maybe you can arrange to have an outdoor picnic with someone you care about while maintaining proper social distancing. Let others know that you would like to connect with them and see if you can work to come up with creative solutions together.
With the current pandemic, we have learned and are living an ever-changing new normal. We keep our social distance. We carefully wash our hands. We wear masks. And with the death of loved ones, with our grief, we live a new normal that morphs over time. Sometimes, we find ourselves wearing invisible masks. With every change we experience, our perspective and our normal changes. We adapt, we adjust and, hopefully, we grow.

We experience losses and transitions throughout life. From elementary school to middle school to high school, from adolescence to adulthood, from job to job and location to location, we say good-bye and hello time and time again. We forge new friendships, develop new skills and build new relationships. Sometimes, we choose to do this. Sometimes, it is forced upon us. Yet, we find ourselves resilient and we do move forward.

Exciting? Yes! Scary? Absolutely!

Do we experience sorrow and joy at the same time? Definitely!

In the next few days, I will retire from Hospice of the Western Reserve. For the past 19 years, I have had the honor of writing “From the Editor.” I have learned so much from my team of bereavement coordinators, music and art therapists and so many others. I have immense gratitude for these lessons. I have been educated about grief, loss and sorrow and schooled in the importance of love, compassion and presence.

Moreover, I have enormous appreciation for all that I have learned from you, the bereaved. I have witnessed your growth through grief and how it takes on different forms. It is truly remarkable to behold. I have watched you work through hard times amidst the tsunami of grief reactions and become more you. Some of you have changed careers, advocated for different reforms, completed art exhibits or books or changed laws. Many of you have developed continuing bonds with your deceased loved one. Seeing how you hold them in your heart as you continue living your life has been such a gift and has lifted me up numerous times.

Thank you all!

Am I excited, scared, joyful and sad? You betcha! But I am certain that I will find wonder and contentment in my next new normal.

I am confident that WRGS will continue to offer the same consolation and support as they forge ahead under the direction and leadership of Karen Hatfield, who has worked alongside me for the past 16 years.

Be well. I leave you with comfort, hope and healing.

Since the beginning of social distancing and stay-at-home orders - two concepts we never imagined being part of our daily vocabulary - life has changed dramatically for everyone. But for those who are grieving, the changes have been overwhelming. If you experienced a death before the coronavirus pandemic, you are now facing the challenge of not having access to the supports that were once available to you. If you have lost a loved one in the midst of this pandemic, you are missing the rituals and activities that might have kept you grounded and supported in such a difficult time. Not being able to hold a funeral or celebration of life for your loved one causes feelings of anxiety, frustration, sadness and isolation in a world of unfinished business.

Because there is no definitive end date to grief, the landscapes of our lives are forever altered no matter the circumstances. When we’re not able to begin the grief process as our customs and beliefs have taught us, how can we honor loved ones in the meantime?

How to Help Grieving Children and Adolescents Through the Pandemic

By Lindsey Neag, MSSA, LSW, LSSW

The COVID-19 pandemic is a unique time in our community and country. Our way of life has been completely uprooted. As we try to find our new normal, it is important to understand how the pandemic affects children and adolescents, specifically the losses that they are experiencing. Many associate grief with the death of a loved one, but we can also grieve significant non-death losses.

One major loss is a sense of normalcy. As the school year begins, our children may have had expectations about returning to school, seeing friends and returning to their normal pre-COVID activities. While some of these may be possible, some may not. Or, they may look and feel very different than they did before due to new rules and regulations. As our kids adjust to these changes, you can help by establishing a regular routine. This can include morning and bedtime hours, educational activities, outdoor play and exercise to foster a sense of control, predictability and wellbeing.

Children and teens are also experiencing the loss of their social lives and ability to see friends and other family members. Engaging in meaningful activities can help ease feelings of isolation. Take a walk in the park, bake together or make crafts. Use technology to stay connected with others.

Children have also lost their sense of safety. They may have questions like: Will I get COVID-19? Will my family get it? Will life ever be normal again? Listen to their concerns, correct misinformation and use age-appropriate language to ease fears. Provide reassurance. Explain that the risk of serious illness is low for children when infected, for example. Explain and demonstrate ways to decrease risk, such as washing hands and maintaining social distancing. Avoid fear-based approaches such as, “If you don’t wash your hands, you will get sick.” Answer questions accurately, but without unnecessary detail.

Finally, some of our children may be unable to see a dying loved one, whether from COVID-19 or other causes. Due to social distancing requirements, many hospitals, long-term nursing homes and hospice facilities have limited the number of visitors. Families are forced to make the difficult decision of who can see their dying loved one. Acknowledge how painful and unfair that feels and encourage children to engage in activities at home that help them to feel connected to their person before they die. This can include sharing stories, eating the person’s favorite foods and connecting virtually with their loved one.

This is a difficult and uncertain time in our children’s lives, but support and comfort from trusted adults can make all the difference.

HOLIDAY FAMILY NIGHT: COMFORT BAGS

The holiday season can be difficult to negotiate when one is grieving. In this workshop, individuals and families can paint and decorate a large or small canvas bag which can be used to carry items of comfort to help them cope during the holidays. Please bring an apron or wear old clothes as we will be using fabric dyes.

Christ Episcopal Church

Shaker Heights

BOOK REVIEW

Healing Grief Card Deck: 55 Practices to Find Peace
by David Kessler

By Tensie Holland LSW, CT

The first card in the collection explains how to use the deck. Kessler, a grief expert and bestselling author, recommends choosing one card daily, preferably at the same time each day. This allows those grieving to move slowly and take their time identifying grief reactions.

The rest of the deck is split into three sections: Your Response to Loss, Understanding Grief and Healing. Each section has 15-20 cards that contain grief education, tips on coping or affirmations. This is a powerful resource, which can be very therapeutic and help you to identify and express your feelings.

Below are examples of cards from each section:

Your Response to Loss:
“Don’t get over grief. You learn to live with it in your heart forever.”

Understanding Grief:
“Grief is work, avoiding grief is even more work. Today, I will not run from the pain. I will allow the healing powers of grief to soften my feelings and mend my broken heart.”

Healing:
“We can be hard on ourselves in grief. Today I will be gentle with myself.”
